Offices

In the long term, this is the most stable sector of commercial real estate. Our portfolio includes both „A“ office buildings in Prague and administrative buildings in the Czech regions, which are less sensitive to potential market changes due to the limited availability of such properties in these locations. However, the fund has in its portfolio office properties in the Polish cities of Katowice, Gdynia, Warsaw and Poznań. Poland in particular, due to the size and nature of the local market, allows for transactions of the necessary scale and profitability, which are scarce in our domestic market. Our portfolio of office buildings is thus diversified not just across quality and sectors of our tenants, but also by country of origin, significantly contributing to the stability of the fund.

In contrast to premium shopping centres, which may be significantly exposed to external influences, including the decline of tourists, INVESTIKA real estate fund focuses on smaller and medium-sized local centres for everyday shopping that withstand potential market turbulence. Banking houses

These inherently conservative properties operate mainly as stabilizing element in the INVESTIKA real estate fund's portfolio, as their long-term tenants include the largest Czech banks. The financial sector in the Czech Republic has repeatedly demonstrated its strong resilience to the impact of fluctuations in global markets. The advantage of having banking real estate assets in the fund's portfolio is also their regional diversification and location in busy areas of major Czech cities.

Logistics and industrial premises

This is currently among the most desirable sectors, which is strengthening significantly. One long-term factor in its growth is, among other things, the expansion of e-commerce, which needs logistics facilities for its function. This sector is characterised by high occupancy rates and the low supply of suitable buildings on the market. The value of logistics real estate derives from long-term lease contracts and attractive locations with an emphasis on transport access.
